
formation of the contacts and vias that connect the various circuit elements. The contact area of the contact is small and contact resistance is large. To achieve adequate thermal dissipation from the semiconductor package, a large interface area between the floating interconnect metal and the semiconductor substrate is required. Unfortunately, the design of the semiconductor package is modified to facilitate adequate thermal dissipation. The thermal performance is sacrificed in order to obtain adequate thermal performance. A typical semiconductor device has two dissimilar materials in contact with each other. A semiconductor device uses dissimilar materials in contact with each other for a variety of reasons. First, dissimilar materials can be used to accomplish a desired result. For example, metallic vias can be used to secure components in a contact area or to maintain the mechanical and electrical contact between the components. Second, dissimilar materials can be used to facilitate the heat dissipation through the semiconductor package. The dissimilar materials used to facilitate heat dissipation are commonly referred to as x e 1cdb3666d
