Well yes. It really is. There are more than just a few television and film genres with the interlaced and half-frame bit. Now when it comes to movies, there are several, and some of the most beloved types, have been around as long as the motion picture industry. Ever since the cinematographers of the original The Wizard of Oz showed that you could get a 16mm film to look like a 70mm film in a theatre by using interlace. It was a genius way of cinematographers getting their full widescreen movie to fit into regular TV screens. And if you know anything about Hollywood, you know that there was a lot of 60s and 70s nostalgia in the genre of the adventure movie. They always seemed to begin with the hero waking up in the morning, telling himself hes going to save the day. After that, theyre off on the adventure of a lifetime; whatever that adventure may be. The problem with this is that when you try to view the video on a normal screen, its not really that great, as you tend to see those half frames and judder. Whats more, its also a lot more expensive to shoot movies than your run of the mill TV episodes, so the budgets are usually a little lower, resulting in movies that just dont look very good. It wasnt long until the computer age arrived, and its been a process of trial and error to find the right tools to get the best results possible. And make no mistake, getting the best results has meant changing the way the footage was captured, what frames where shot, and the way your viewers will view it. This process of change through time would continue to continue for the next 20 or so years.
